Bridge In Greenwood Park

Muriel Pyburn, longtime Heritage Society Board Member and community volunteer, stands on the bridge in Greenwood Park as her mother did over 80 years ago (see next page). Originally built in 1904 by the Museum Association, it has been rebuilt many times over the years, the most recent time by Mike Heilbron in 1989.

Edward Berwick and the Farmers' Institutes

❖ By E. C. Davis

As part of the plan for land-grant colleges in the late 19th century, on-going education for farmers was felt to be important. Many of the states had programs of one sort or another, California among them. In order to gain grass-roots support for the University, seen as an expensive frill outside the realm of the farmer, Institutes were beginning to be popular and were held under the university auspices for many years. At one time about eighty such affairs were held annually, and among them, one in Pacific Grove. They were three day affairs held at the end of August and the beginning of September. In 1897 the Pacific Grove Review, a weekly paper, announced that the popular educator, Edward Berwick, would be on hand to give his experiences. The Southern Pacific Railway would give a 30% discount on fares for those attending. On that occasion, Edward Berwick spoke on apple growing and the need for a canal through the Central American isthmus, so barley, wheat and other crops could be sent to Europe where they would get the highest prices.

In 1898, through the pages of the Review, he publicized the event well in advance. In early December he was off to Fresno to attend a State Fruit Growers' Convention. His farm in Carmel Valley produced fruit for the old Del Monte Hotel and was shipped all over the state. In 1899 he was once again an active participant and chairman at the Institute. In 1901 he arranged the program and reported cheerfully to the Review that attendance was up. The theme was to "make the most of your small corner". Under discussion was water, weeds, dairy and co-ops.

So the program continued. Edward Berwick preached self-efficiency, the dignity of work, and the betterment of life for the small farmer. The programs didn't dwell on large scale farming, although the pattern from California was distinctively just that from the beginning.

In 1903 Berwick discussed the programs of the previous year and one of the speakers distributed vials of codling moths (pupae) and asked farmers to notify him of the exact date of emergence. Edward Berwick spoke on free U.S. postal service for farmers, with emphasis on how this could reduce isolation. There were lectures on aphids, nutrition of farm stock, etc. A poem was declaimed by William Adam, water color artist-in-residence in Pacific Grove. A solo was sung. Also in 1903, Berwick was in San Francisco lecturing on horticulture. In 1904 he lectured in Willits and Centerville (now a part of Fremont) at other Farmers' Institutes. In Pacific Grove he continued as chairman. On the panel of speakers was a woman (Mrs. M. E. Sherman) lecturing on dairying. There was a discussion of taxes, spraying machinery, raising grapes, food preservation and five minute speeches. Professor Fairweather sang "My Own United States".

In 1931, a few years before his death at 91, Edward Berwick was at the Monterey High School, telling teenagers what it was like to send wagon-loads of pears to the Monterey railroad depot by eight horse teams over Carmel Hill. He would have told them, too, of managing sheep and cattle lands in southern Monterey County in the late 1860s when he made his California beginnings. When droughts ended large scale stock raising, he had taken to growing fruit in the Carmel Valley for thirty years before turning the ranch over to his son and retiring to Pacific Grove.

Farmers' Institutes are a thing of the past, but the Extension Services that grew out of them still flourish.

(Editor's note: The Berwick home was at 343 Ocean View Blvd until 1963, when it was demolished to make room for the apartments now there.)
